“University In Transition”: The writer of this piece describes the homecoming festivities that will take place this week. The writer argues that while the school will hold all sorts of celebrations and events, the weekend means more to current students as they are the ones who know the football players, decorate the houses and wear the homecoming crowns. The writer also argues that it is on the current students to show the visiting alumni all the good changes that have been made on campus.

“Alumni Head Traces U History, Progress From ‘High School’ Days,” by Paul Cracroft: The writer tells the history of the University, from its days as a High School to now being a fully functioning university. The writing comes as part of the celebration of homecoming weekend. The writer, Paul Cracroft, is the Executive Secretary of the Alumni Association.

“Letters to the Editor”: Carri Bjorkman writes to say that students should focus more on local and state issues rather than focusing on issues at a national level. She says that the well being of the state depends on the well being of the community, in this case, the university. Kent McCrimmon writes to inform students and readers of the Great Issues Forum that is coming up soon on campus.

“In Transition” by Robert Clark: In this opinion piece, the writer argues that the American university is changing. They argue that the structure of the university is different than it was in years past which has prevented individuals from ‘acting out of context with prevailing social norms.’ They also argue that universities are becoming a business due to more students attending along with higher tuition costs. He argues that the American university has given up its idealism and “bowed before social demands.”

“More Action Less Talk For Programs,” by Gordon Newby: ASUU announced “Project Awareness” which intends to help students know of projects around campus. This was also an attempt to increase social awareness of the students and help students be more cognizant of their place in the world. Newby, however, argues that while this goal is admirable, little has been done to actually achieve it and rather, there has been mostly talk. He says there needs to be more action on the part of ASUU.

“Improvements”: This magazine section of the Chronicle is to address questions that are leveled at the University as well as to highlight some of the less-than ideal parts of the University of Utah and address some of the concerns in an effort to create action of the part of the school and its students.

“Is The University A Parent? Now, Yes - But It Can’t Last,” by Ernest Ford: In this opinion piece, Ford argues that while the past decade has been one of excitement and progress, it has been less than ideal for college students, who have been labeled idiots and conformists. He argues that while students have found new power in civil marches and student elections, the school has pushed back against its students and clinged to its power. He says that the school has held tight control over its students, taking on the role of ‘pseudo parents’ for its students. Ford argues that the students are here to learn, part of which means that they need to experience its own leadership and make their own decisions, which would require the school to “shed their cloaks of authority.” Ford believes the school is too controlling and needs to let its students make some of their own decisions.

He argues that students today are less mature and less prepared for college than students in years' past. Although, he says, society is less concerned with how students will adjust, which makes life more difficult for college students. He goes on to argue that it is the job of the colleges to fix these problems and determine what it expects of these students, or else college students will fail.

Instead of just listing these issues, however, the author offers some solutions that he believes would help to fix these problems. His solutions include a reduction in class size and an increase of conceptual thinkers rather than factual assimilation. While the problems are important, he argues, they can be fixed.
